lined up during a turn and created a horizontal bluk of cars driving over cars over Roads, colliding but colliding per colliding

On top of these two images was a third, the Reflection of 8ther passengers in the plexiglass shield that was close to my face. Sometimes I'd see my face of the train as it bent and shook. I would rest my eyes on these juxtapositions into a broad, warping, rushing single thrashing apart still figures and heads.

Often, as I held this world together, a foorth image would appear: the tops of the trees looming over it all. In this mirage, I was moving they were magnifying and embracing them, everything. I don't know where this dobble fane or odd angle in the glass, I don't know where this dobble fane or odd angle in the to hold onto it would move past me flow of irreflic again.
